Florida Gov. Ron DeSantis hosts press conference in Cry...

“A lot of the problems and issues that we identified, I confirmed,” he said. Gleason raised questions about modems attached to Hillsborough’s voting tabulators, which he contends can be hacked.

Latimer says that's not true.

Concerns were also raised about blank ballots and whether several votes may have gone uncounted in recent elections.

Latimer explained that in elections where there are two full pages of candidates and issues, some only vote in the main races, and leave the rest blank.

“So, it's not unusual,” said Latimer, “that when we have a two-card ballot that there is a large number of blank ballots. When we have a one-card ballot that goes down to almost zero, because somebody votes for something on that ballot.”

What happens if Biden drops out of presidential race?

“There’s a tremendous amount of checks and balances that continue in this,” Latimer said.

That includes a paper trail and keeping the state, along with the political parties, informed.

Latimer also sits on the canvassing board, which provides oversight and certifies the electoral process.

As of June 30, Republicans have 956,443 more registered voters in Florida compared to Democrats.

Since 2020, the number of registered Republicans have grown in the state of Florida, outnumbering the amount of registered Democrats. (Source: Florida Division of Elections)

“The Republican Party of Florida has focused on voter registration for the last four years and it has been a concentrated effort, and we have been very successful,” said Republican political analyst April Schiff.

“Obviously, the numbers bear that out. The other thing that has affected that are a lot of the new people that are moving to Florida. They’re coming to Florida for a reason, and
